This post was published by a system I built at zero cost.

Swipe for the breakdown →

01

Posts are written in batches and saved as files in a queue

02

A validator checks every post before it can go live, and a rules file bans made-up prices or claims

03

GitHub Actions publishes to Threads and LinkedIn on time, retries failed posts, and skips anything more than 3 hours late

04

A dashboard pulls real results back: posts, comments, ebook orders and leads

Designing the rules took longer than writing the code. The hard part is deciding what must never happen.

What's one repetitive task in your business you'd automate first?
